The Highland Clearances and the Genesis of Emigration

The mid-18th century witnessed significant upheaval in the Scottish Highlands. The Highland Clearances, a period of forced evictions and displacement of tenant farmers, created a surplus population desperate for land and opportunity. Landowners, driven by the increasing profitability of sheep farming, sought to consolidate their holdings, leading to the brutal displacement of thousands of Highlanders. This created a fertile ground for recruitment efforts from across the Atlantic. The promise of land ownership and escape from poverty in the New World proved irresistible to many, fueling a wave of emigration.

James Oglethorpe's Vision and Recruitment Strategies

James Oglethorpe, the founder of the Georgia colony, understood the potential benefits of attracting skilled and hardy settlers. He recognized the military prowess and agricultural expertise of the Highlanders, viewing them as valuable additions to the colony's defense and economy.
